Siri and all, with their, rues, \Mr. And when, anu other, men of 'ral part, are ar.ud by a citizen to make corporal punishment for violation of the law, or some other like offense, it becomes illegal corporal punishment to punish such a citizen. A governmental agency has a right to punish or imprison a citizen for a crime against the State, but a private citizen has no right to punish or imprison an individual for a crime against the individual. Therefore, in the absence of a criminal statute, a citizen may not punish a prisoner in his or her private jail. Prisoners in a private jail, even those who have been released from probation, may not sue an individual citizen for damages arising from an unjustified detention or imprisonment. Even if a prisoner who has been released from probation has a cause of action against a third party, he or she has no cause of action against an individual citizen who has detained the individual or imprisoned the individual. It is a very serious, indeed, when individual citizens, for any reason, punish a prisoner in a private jail. Consider a businessman who invokes the authority of the State to arrest an individual who is trespassing on his property. The businessman then punishes the trespasser in a private jail, either because of the individual trespasser's defiance of the individual's authority or for some other reason. The businessman may have a right to arrest the individual, but the businessman does not have a right to punish the individual in a A State may have the right to take an individual into custody and to imprison the individual. Even so, a private citizen who detains or imprison a prisoner has no right to punish or imprison a prisoner in a An individual who has been convicted of a felony in a misdemeanor case and released from the State's custody has no right to claim damages from a private citizen who, during the individual's incarceration, punished him or her in a private jail. If the individual has been released from probation, the individual does not have a right to who, during the individual 82157476af
