In a meeting with North Korea's Olympic Committee, Chairman Kim Jong-il (Kim Jong-un's late father) discussed the issue in detail with the son, the sources said. The meeting was held before Kim Jong-il's death in December 2011. "The party elders said the younger Kim is emphasizing the need to compete in next year's Winter Olympics in South Korea as well as Asian Games and that the government needs to take necessary measures to boost the nation's image," the sources said. It was also stressed during the meeting that a military delegation should be sent to the Olympics and Asian Games as a reward to the athletes who had participated in the regional and global competitions. A special committee of the party's central committee has been set up to carry out the directives, the sources said. "When the younger Kim held a meeting with the party's central committee in March, the committee agreed that North Korea should participate in the Asian Games in Indonesia in the second half of 2014," a source said. "Kim said there will be high expectations of North Korea. He also added that the nuclear issue is a great threat to the world, and he should use the opportunity to showcase the nation's military might." The latest directive comes after North Korea won the gold medal in the men's curling event in the Asian Games in Incheon, South Korea, earlier this month.
